THIS IS WHAT HAPPENS WHEN SOMEONE WITH TASTE BUILDS A TOWNHOME. 309, 437 Alpine Avenue SW is proof that design can feel intentional without feeling forced. Every choice—from the MATTE BLACK HARDWARE to the calm flooring tones—lands exactly where it should. The result is a home that feels composed, confident, and quietly refined. The PRIVATE WEST-FACING ENTRY feels residential in the best way—no shared corridors or echoing stairwells—just your own address and an intentional sense of arrival. Inside, the palette stays grounded: warm Toasted-Almond LVP floors, QUARTZ COUNTERS that actually reflect daylight instead of glare, and BLACK FIXTURES that give definition without shouting. The main floor flows the way life actually happens—work and breakfast colliding on one KITCHEN ISLAND, coffee drifting onto the EAST-FACING BALCONY, dinner stretching past sunset because the space simply works. Upstairs, THREE BEDROOMS pull off that elusive balance of practical and personal. The master keeps its composure with a clean ensuite and a closet that doesn't need to apologize. The other two are flexible—guest-ready, office-worthy, or both—and the laundry is mercifully where you live, not where you forget. Downstairs, the TANDEM DOUBLE GARAGE doesn't just park cars; it swallows gear, bikes, and the freezer full of "backup meals." It's the kind of everyday functionality that rarely gets design credit—but deserves it here. And beyond the front door: Alpine Park. A southwest community built around connection, walkability, and a sense of design that actually matters. Sidewalks lead to cafés instead of cul-de-sacs, and parks show up right where your day needs a reset. Possession is set for
